nese do not even aim at making their houses substantial, as English houses are, or as even when constructed by a 'jerry builder, they profess to be. The outer walls of an English house are always intended to be fixtures, and so far durable that when once put up they cannot be pulled down without sending for workmen; but among the Japa-nese two or more of the sides are not per manent walls, but are closed with sliding screens, which can be set up and taken down at the pleasure of the numates. On a Neam Flooring & Planing Mill SCHOOL BOOKS, quired, the whole side of a room can be hot day, or when thorough ventilation is re opened to the outer air.

Of course, people who are not particular about having a permanent wall between their rooms and the outside world, do not care to have immovable partitions between one part of the bouse and another. Al though in England rooms are occasionally parted from one another by a curtain, or by folding doors, yet, as a general rule, they are separate by walls, which, however filmsy their construction may be, are fix tures, and cannot be taken away and re placed at will. But in Japan one room is commonly parted from the next merely by a screen -a frame work of wood covered with paper, which runs in a shallow groove on the floor and a deeper groove on the ceiling, a plan which gives the inhabitants the power of adding to or decreasing the numpower of adding to or decreasing the number of their apartments at their pleasure.

Baron Nordenskjold, the famous Arctic traveler, has recorded the surprise with which he woke up one morning at a Japan sess into in quite a small room, having gone to bed over night in a very large one.

It has been suggested that the reason why the Japanese do not quild their houses more called in a that in a lead like theirs of con-HENRY BRENGLE, No. 521 King street, still keeps all the delicacies of the season, and his stock will make winter seem warmer and add to the

The floors of Japanese rooms are invari ably carpeted with rush mats of very care ful construction, some two or three inches thick and about six feet long by three broad. As these mats are all of one pattern the size of a room can be determined by the number of mats it contains, and it is described as a six mat or a twelve mat room, as the case may be. Since the commonest rooms are either of six or of eight mats, and since an eight mat room is only about twelve feet by twelve in extent, it will be seen that the rooms of a Japanese house, like the Japanese house itself, are generally small. The Japanese fireplace is generally a portable brazier, made of bronze, porcelain or wood, lined with clay, in which not coal, but char-coal ashes are burned. Sometimes, however, there is a clay lined hole in the floor containing a fire of the same kind. - Cassell Family Magazine.
